

We Will Not Allow the World to Look Away

Description

This art piece is made with watercolor paint, pastel, colored pencil, and headlines from magazines and the newspaper about climate change. The piece is about the inequality in how climate change affects different people and countries. It shows how those who contribute the most to climate change have not yet started to feel its effects, and those who don't contribute as much to climate change have started to feel its effects sooner.

About the Artist

Ada is a 15-year-old freshman at Albuquerque Academy. She has cared about climate change all her life because she loves spending time outdoors and wants to preserve the natural world. She also cares about climate change because she doesn't want those who are inheriting Earth to have to solve this problem later even though they didn't contribute to it.
